FARMERS' CLUB.

Extirpation of Briars and Sprouts The Best Species of Seed Wheat.

THE BEST SPECIES OF WHEAT.
The committee appointed to ascertain the best species of wheat for this country, made the following report:
We, having been appointed a committee by the Farmers' Club to ascertain the best species of seed wheat for this country, submit the following report:

We have found it no small task to determine which is the best kind of wheat for this particular latitude. But from all the information we have from actual experiment and other sources, we consider the "Red Stew" and "May Wheat," the best, provided the seed is obtained annually from Southern Kentucky.

It opens about ten days earlier than other species, except Southern wheat, and is seldom attacked by rust. It is less liable to smut, and stands the winter well. When sown on good land, it yields a good crop—forty-two bushels are known to have been harvested from an acre—and it makes the best straw. We consider the Mediterranean wheat the best for this land.

H. FREDRICK,
G. M. PRATHER,
Committee.

THE PRYOR RED APPLE.
Dr. Allen read an interesting paper on the disease of the "Pryor Red Apple" which, however, he reserved for revision and amplification.

BRIERS AND SPROUTS.
Amid the interminable forests which once covered large portions of the Western States, it was formerly the practice of pioneer farmers who desired to make additions to arable fields to belt adjacent woodlands, and wait two to four years after the operation was performed—that is, after a cut was made running quite round the trunk, separating the bark below from that above the cut without injuring the alburnum. Within that period most forest trees, except timber trees with large heart-wood, such as poplar and walnut, would become dead, dry, and partially rotten, and this result followed the operation of belting, whether it was performed in spring or fall, summer or winter. If, however, the tree were despoiled by cutting through both bark and alburnum, or by cutting down the trunk, the effect upon the life of the stump was very much modified by the season of the year when the cutting was performed. If, in spring, when the roots were in full health and vigor, many trees, such as hickory, beech, and walnut, would stimulate to active growth and adventitious buds and sending out a cluster of shoots for every large division of the roots would soon have the stump as vigorously alive as before the despoiling of the trunk and branches. If, however, this deadening took place at the close of summer when the trees were yet in full leaf and the leaves, which are to plants the organs of digestion, were not yet employed in renewing supplies of plant food for another year in place of that which they had exhausted, under these circumstances the most serious injury to the life of a tree would be sustained, which it was in the power of the axe-man to inflict. Many sorts would die. A few would throw out feeble sprouts to be promptly removed, and only the mulberry and willow were so tenacious of life as to refuse to succumb to this treatment, and to require either belting or grubbing up as a means for their destruction. To these principles, any theory for the destruction of trees and sprouts must conform, if we would be successful in practice; but as regards weeds and briars, we cannot but think, but must cut them, thus separating the leaves, which are the organs of digestion from the roots, which are the mouths of plants. In regard to briars, experience seems to indicate the close of summer as the auspicious period for a single cutting, and tradition has fixed the exact period in summer by naming the dark of the moon in August.

The briar is peculiar in its habits, and is in its stems but a biennial growing to its full size the first year, and bearing and dying the second. But if in March or April, the bearing shoots are removed, the eyes which were to form the bearing shoots for the second year will grow more luxuriantly than if the top had escaped such spring cutting; but every cutting made during the summer whilst the briar is in full leaf, will weaken the roots, and a cutting in May followed by a cutting late in summer, we think would be quite as hurtful to the life of the plant as any single cutting during a year however well timed each single cutting might be. The philosophy of the operation is this: that as the roots or mouths of the briar plant have in the ascending round of circulation sent up to the leaves their stores of plant food, dissolved in water imbibed from the soil, to be by the leaves digested and when digested to be distributed over the whole body of the plant, including the roots, so that they would be thereby compensated for the plant substance sent up in circulation, so when by amputation the plant food, digested and undigested, leaves, shoot and all were separated from the roots in this exhausted condition, the next shoot sent by these exhausted roots must be greatly enfeebled; and if during the same season this enfeebled shoot or top should be cut again, the roots would be still more exhausted, if not thoroughly killed.

Weeds that are perennial must be managed much after the manner of briars, cutting their tops at such times as will be most exhaustive to the roots, and after having once cut them with a view to their extermination, they should be cut once or oftener every succeeding year until exterminated.

If we attempt to kill noxious annual weeds, such as rag weed or horse weed, by cutting, that operation should be performed after the weeds are in bloom, but before any of the new crop of seed are large enough to vegetate.
